years before, he drew his sword under the elm at Cambridge as commanderine-hief of the Continental army. To lead a people in revolution wisely and successfully, without ambition and without a crime, demands, indeed, lofty genius and unbending virtue. But to build their state,—amid the incredulity of many, and the graved doubt of all, to organize for them and peacefully to inaugurate a complete and satisfactory government, is the greatest service that man can render to mankind. But this, also, is the glory of Washington. The power of his personal character, his penetrating foresight, and the wisdom of his judgment, in composing the myriad elements that threatened to overwhelm the mighty undertaking, are all unparalleled. "Nothing but harmony, honesty, industry and fragality," he said to Lafayette, "are necessary to make us a great and happy people." But he was not a man of phrases nor did he suppose that government could be established or maintained by lofty professions of virtue. No man's perception of the indispeninteresting the stable of governing and with interference of the product of the stable great sout, amidst battle, and defeat, and long retreat, and the sinking heart of a people, undismayed, was not appalled by the convuision of the world. Amidst the uprear of Christendom he knew liberty too well to be deluded by its mad pretence. Without a beacon, without a chart, but with unwavering eye and steady hand, he guided his country safe through darkness and through storm. In the angry shock of domestic parties, "there is but one character which keeps them in awe," wrote Edmund Randolph, "The foundation of the moral world," said a wise teacher in Oxford university, lidding young Englishmen mark the matchless man,—"the foundations of the moral world were shaken, but not the understanding of Washington." He held his steadfast way, like the sun across the firmament, giving life, and health, and strength, to the new nation; and upon "searching survey of his administration, which established the fundamental principles of American policy in every department, there is no great act which his country would amud, no word spoken, no line written, no deed done by bim, which justice would reverse or wisdom deplore.

The Galveston News and Fort Worth GAZETTE have made friends. The News had failed to acknowledge the influence of the GAZETTE, and had entirely turned a deaf ear to the rapid strides of journalism in North Texas. The GAZETTE rounded her up and re-ceived the consolation that the Fort Worth GAZETTE and the Galveston News were the bright and shining stars of Texas. Well, this was a very nice concession, but rather hard on a few other would-be influential journals of the Lone Star.
